

College Momentum — Fall 2025

This fall, the PDI team hit the road, traveling to Arizona, UCF, Oregon, and Oklahoma to work with college programs across the country. During each visit, players completed a full PDI Assessment covering 48 different skillsets.

This comprehensive, combine-style evaluation gives athletes a clear picture of where their skills stand—not only compared to college golfers nationwide, but also within their own team. By breaking performance down across physical, golf, and mental skill areas, players can see exactly which strengths to build on and which weaknesses may be holding them back.

The goal is simple: empower athletes with data-driven insights so they can take ownership of their development, focus on the areas that matter most, and continue pushing toward their next level. With this holistic approach, programs gain a deeper understanding of their team's performance landscape, and players walk away with a personalized roadmap for improvement.

“Coming back from a tournament and being able to pull different parts of an assessment and compare that to a player or team's performance can make for easy parallels to draw a practice.”
- Jim Anderson, Arizona Head Men's Coach

“The PDI assessment is just another data point that a coach can look at. We're always looking at rankings, but I think the PDI Assessment is that additional ranking that we can compare to our own players to assess where recruits are at” - Emily Marron, UCF Head Women's Coach

“You're always looking in recruiting for more information. To get a score, to see where their skill level is, can be really helpful. Also, determining that maybe there's a kid that might be a really good player but might have a hole in his game, and being able to identify that and knowing that we can maybe fix that, would give me a little more confidence in recruiting somebody. So, there's a lot of different angles that you can take with it, but getting kids better and getting more information is at the heart of it.” - Casey Martin, Oregon Head Men's Coach

“We are using PDI because we are continuously looking for innovative ways to invest in our student-athletes' development in our constant pursuits of championships!” - Veronique Drouin-Luttrell, Oklahoma Head Women's Coach
